

...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...

The file of Frederick has merit of a different kind. Superior to vanity and incapable of any egotistic model, perceptive and candid, he does not relate his own doings, but with the firmness of a philosopher and the simplicity of a veteran. He never flatters, and never flinches. He does not seem to be conscious of his infinite superiority to the rest of mankind, yet the reader feels it as distinctly in the closet, as Lauder, de Lignere, felt it in the field.

On the other hand, the first consul has more of the impetuosity of youth, and the vivacity of a Frenchman. Without apparent attention, he makes you understand very sensibly that he expects to be deposed. But, as Dr. Johnson has said of Dryden, "while he forces himself upon our esteem, we cannot refuse him" [a title] "to stand high in his own."

From the LANCETTER JOURNAL.
DEMOCRATIC CONSISTENCY AGAIN.

Till very lately Callender stood on the pinnacle of democratic praise. O! "he was one of the sincerest patriots in the world!" His writings were unparalleled—"The Spirit of Despotism," "the Register," "the History of the United States," and "the Prospect before us," were more eagerly sought after by the democrats than the bible. A Senator of the United States was proud in offering him a "hospitable roof." The mild and charitable Mr. Jefferson, paid him considerable sums of money for abusing Washington and Adams,—and the public treasury was unlocked for his necessities.

But the moment Callender became disgusted with the vile hypocrisy of pretended republicanism; the moment he began to unmask the demagogues, and to tell serious truths of self-filled patriots; that moment the democrats began to abuse him, and he is now called a liar and a scoundrel in every Jacobin bazaar and public office of the union. But Callender knows human nature too well to write under such a feeble lash. He has discovered their ingratitude and by hypocrisy and he is determined no longer to be the confident of their secrets, or the dupe of their machinations.

[The reader is requested to observe that Callender never wrote nor never saw such a book as "the Register," or "The Spirit of Despotism."]

FROM THE BALTIMORE REPUBLICAN, OR ANTI-DEMOCRAT.

PERHAPS, in all probability, there is not a more abandoned liar in the United States than William Duane, alias Duane. In the Agora of Monday last is the following:

It is an abandoned falsehood that Mr. Nicholson declared, during last session of the floor of Congress, that Mr. Pickering was a man of unimpeachable integrity. He asserted no such thing. In fact, he said that in relation to Mr. Pickering, without evidence of any kind he must be considered as impeached in his integrity. Evidence has been filed and is still being, he was impeached before this country, and held up as an example to young fryars of the public who influence the government, or despise the people.

It is possible there can be another being in the world, such as the late Mr. Duane, who is so much better than the people.

...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...

Here follows the close of the debate on that day.

Mr. Nicholson, in reply to Mr. Griswold. The gentleman and himself differed as to the power of the committee that had attended to the investigation of the treasury accounts he believed they were not authorized to enter on enquiry whether all the monies received by Col. Pickering were properly appropriated: this was his object. He had been informed, of late, that Mr. Pickering had in some instances appropriated more money than he was allowed, and had sometimes appropriated money to purposes, though public purposes, otherwise than ordered: it was his wish that the house should adopt some regulations in such matters, not leaving appropriations discretionary with officers, and the better to enable the comptroller to settle accounts. He was sensible of the impossibility of their making a thorough investigation, and that they must turn to the treasury for information; but that when the attention of the people was called to particular characters in this manner, it was their duty to satisfy them, he did not wish to single out Mr. Pickering alone; he wished equal reference to others. The proposed resolution was not on account of any doubts in his mind. He did not entertain the least suspicion that Mr. Pickering had ever appropriated to his own use, or defrauded the public of a single dollar; he believed him to be a man of irreproachable honesty and integrity; but the report of the former committee did not say enough. [This is highly honorable to Mr. Nicholson. We wish every member were equally candid and honest in his declaration of facts, the truth of which we believe not one of them doubts; yet how many (a just indignation pricks us) how many joy in having their constituents believe that Mr. Pickering, Mr. Dayton, &c. have been defrauders and fraudsters: how many glory in the murder of that illustrious patriot, towards which they can never reach. Duane stood back of Mr. Nicholson in the lobby; and though some might addition might have been made to his natural hideousness of visage; he bore the frown of general scorn and condemnation with all that triple brafs, which usually dignifies this lame imitation of humanity.]

Mr. Griswold. He pretends it very probable that there had been occasional excesses of appropriations; every man acquainted with public business knew that the public service would have often suffered; had not this been the case, and members know how often this had happened, and how often Congress had punished and reformed afterwards, the excesses of appropriation. Laws cannot always touch contingencies; it had often been the case in the office of the secretary at war, Congress afterwards made by the expenditures; the excesses were not to be prevented, and necessary to be applied to may it have been in the office of the Secretary of War.

...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...

...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...

...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...

...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...

...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...

...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...

...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...

...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...

...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...
...of the great general in the public eye...

